

Paul Taylor BSc PGDipSci PhD MACS

Paul is employed by the Radiowave Therapy Research Institute to advise on clinical data collection, statistical analysis of patient outcomes and liaise with the Institute's contract researchers.

Paul graduated from UWA, majoring in Mathematics and studying Physics. He was awarded two post-graduate degrees in Computer Science, including a distinction for his PhD. This research dealt with the developmental biology of the human mammary gland and the use of digital mammography for breast cancer prediction.

Paul has worked for over thirty years in Government, academic and medical organizations. For the past ten years he has managed of his own business that provides specialized software for medical and scientific applications.

Paul has presented his research at a number of international conferences and has published research in the fields of engineering, biochemistry and computer science. He is a member of the Australian Computer Society.

